MPHarm expands beyond medicines to develop medical devices

It will equip pharmacists with technical understanding to work efficiently with engineers and other Professionals

Priyadarshini.Gupta

In a move to broaden the scope of pharmacy education, beyond medicines and traditional pharmaceutical manufacturing, the Pharmacy Council of India (PCI) has introduced medical devices as a new MPHarm specialisation pro-gramme. The objective is to create professionals who can understand not just how a medical device is made, but whether it is safe, clinically useful, and compliant with regulations.

The programme reflects the growing link between healthcare, medicines, engineering and medical technology. Speaking to Education Times, Deependra Singh, chairman, Education Regulation Committee, PCI, says, "Traditionally, pharmacy education has focused on medicines, including drug discovery, formulation, manufacturing, quality control, and regulatory processes. Medical devices require knowledge of materials, product design, manufacturing processes, mechanical and electrical testing, risk management, and device-specific regulatory requirements. The new specialisation will bridge this gap by bringing together pharmacy, engineering concepts, regulatory science, and entrepreneurship."

Medical-device development has a strong engineering component; however, it does not seek to replicate BTech or MTech programmes in engineering. "The objective is not to turn pharmacists into engineers but to equip them with sufficient technical understanding to work effectively with engineers and other professionals involved in medical development," he adds.

The curriculum will familiarise students with the complete device lifecycle, beginning with design and classification and extending to manufacturing, testing, biocompatibility assessment, quality management, regulatory approval and post-market monitoring. "Students will gain exposure to areas such as Intellectual Property Rights (IPR), Health Technology Assessment (HTA), reimbursement, and market access, which are important in bringing medical technologies from development to clinical use," he says.

At the UG level

Medical device education has also been introduced at the undergraduate level through the BPharm syllabus. Daksh Bhatia, professor, KIET School of Pharmacy, Ghaziabad, says, "While the MPHarm Medical Devices specialisation is expected to come into effect from 2027-28, the revised UG curriculum has introduced some relevant areas from 2026-27 session.
