Classical language CoEs to boost research and digitisation

Debasmita.Dasgupta ©timesofindia.com

The Ministry of Education (MoE) has approved five Centres of Excellence (CoEs) dedicated to Classical Assamese, Bengali, Marathi, Pali and Prakrit, signaling a renewed institutional push to strengthen the study of India's linguistic heritage. While the centres are expected to expand research and preservation efforts, academics say their long-term results will be revealed only if • CoEs address gaps in faculty, academic opportunities, digitisation and career pathways for students and researchers.

Expanding Access

The proposed CoE for Classical Pali could help address the limited academic opportunities currently available for students and researchers, says Prof Prafulla Garhpal, associate professor, and coordinator, Centre for Pali Studies and Research, Central Sanskrit University, Lucknow. "Pali is the language of the teachings of Lord Buddha. When we read a translation, many nuances of the original text are inevitably lost," he says, adding that greater access to Pali would allow students and researchers to engage with Buddhist texts, including the Tripita-ka, in their original form.

Prof Garhpal highlights that there are a limited number of universities offering Pali programmes and the lack of adequate options through distance or open learning. He says the proposed centre could support structured courses, workshops and teacher-training programmes while creating greater academic opportunities for students who complete postgraduate studies and qualify for NET and JRF.

Through these CoEs, technology could also widen access to these languages. " There is a need for dictionaries connecting Pali with other Indian languages. There is also a need for reverse dictionaries, for instance, Hindi-to-Pali, where a person can look up a Hindi word and find its equivalent in Pali," he says. Prof Garhpal also highlighted the possibility of academic collaborations with countries such as Sri Lanka, Myanmar, Thailand and Laos, where Pali has a strong scholarly and monastic tradition.

Scholarly Preservation

For Classical Assamese, the proposed CoE could expand research opportunities while strengthening efforts to preserve and promote the language. Prof Ausumi Dut-ta, HoD, Assamese, Dibm College, Dibrugarh, Assam, says centre could support scholars through dedicated fellowships and outreach initiatives. "The CoE can offer dedicated PhD and postdoctoral fellowships and can organise outreach programmes for academicians as well as general public to garner further attention to this field, for example, by organising lectures, conferences, workshops etc," says ProfDutta.

Connecting Classical Assamese with disciplines such as history, linguistics, manuscript studies, and comparative literature could promote interdisciplinary research, generate new academic inquiries, and broaden scope of existing scholarship. "These steps could be among several others which,*will transform the CoB^into a proponent for jk the preservation and promotion of Classical As samese while also actively shaping the careers of the next generation of scholars," she adds.
