Unpaid internships turn work experience into a financial burden

As internships become key to gaining practical experience, students are increasingly bearing the cost, raising concerns over affordability, quality and the use of interns as cheap labour

Rounak.Bhat
©timesof india. com

Even as the NEP 2020 emphasises internships as a mandatory, credit-bearing core component for college students, the India Skills Report 2026, released by Educational Testing Services (ETS), found that 9 2.8 % of candidates prefer in-ternships for practical exposure. While overall graduate employability stands at 56.35%, many students face a financial burden to gain that experience, as unpaid or low-' paying internships are the norm in India's job market.

"Outside that initiative, much of the market still runs on internships that ask for a student's time without offering financial support in return, which is where the real strain in the system sits," says Aj ay Pratap Singh, regional director, South Asia, ETS.

The concern is not simply the availability of internships, but whether students can afford to take them. When paid and structured opportunities are limited, students may accept unpaid roles to build the experience employers increasingly expect. " That shifts risk onto the candidate rather than the employer, "Singh says.

Sougata Mukherjea, professor of practice, HT Delhi, says companies often prefer unpaid internships to reduce costs. "There is scepticism about whether incoming interns are sufficiently trained to produce valuable contributions." While it may be considered an 'exploitative approach', this is a mutual arrangement in most cases.

Structured Avenue
The government has sought to expand structured paid opportunities through the Prime Minister's internship scheme (PMIS), which is intended to provide young people with workplace exposure in prominent MNCs.
By May 2026, more than 63,000 internship opportunities were available under the scheme, with monthly financial assistance of Rs 9,000 and a one-time incidental grant of Rs 6,000.

"From an intern's perspective, students want to make their resume look stronger, especially by listing experience with a larger organisation, hence they end up willingly taking an unpaid position," he adds. "Since there is no government regulation safeguarding the rights of interns, it varies contract to contract," adds Prof Mukherjea.

VRamgopalRao, group vice chancellor, BITS Pilani, says internships should be judged by the learning they provide, but affordability also needs to be considered. "Students doing substantial work for an organisation should ordinarily receive a stipend. Where a valuable research or startup opportunity is unpaid, institutions should help deserving students meet their expenses," he says.

TeamLease Edtech founder and CEO Shantanu Rooj says all internships and apprenticeship opportunities facilitated through its ecosystem are paid. "Internships in India have traditionally been treated as short-term learning opportunities rather than as a formal part of the talent pipeline. With many students competing for workplace exposure before graduation, employers can often attract applicants even without offering compensation," Rooj says. "Our research shows that 42 % of students consider stipend and benefits important while choosing an opportunity, indicating that expectations are changing."

The issue, however, is not simply whether an internship is paid. It is also whether students receive meaningful training in return for their time.
